Fagner serves North Carolina with Red Cross

Amber L. Tomlinson

As Hurricane Florence began to drench the Carolinas, Red Cross volunteer Sherry Fagner knew she would be receiving a call for deployment.

What she wasn't expecting was an invitation to join 21 people from seven Red Cross divisions that were picked to be part of a leadership team.

Fagner left Sept. 17 for mass care leadership training in Fairfax, Virginia, Red Cross headquarters, before heading to North Carolina for two weeks.

"It was a boot camp accelerated to the specifics of the disaster response that is going on right now," said Fagner, who has been deployed four times in less than a year. "But the goal is to keep us engaged and keep us involved so when the next disaster response comes along we are better prepared and better equipped to go out the door. Not to mention we are better equipped for our own areas."

Fagner was originally assigned to the Durham area with the district headquarters being in Raleigh, North Carolina. She was to serve as an assistant feeding lead for Division 1 during the Hurricane Florence relief operation. She was then reassigned to the Greenville Red Cross District 2 and she will continue to serve as a feeding lead.

According to the Red Cross, mass care helps to meet disaster victims' needs such as offering shelters, food and family reunification.

"We are going on faith," said Fagner, who has been a Red Cross volunteer for the past five years. "It's exciting stuff."

Fagner said she is staying in a staff shelter and working 12-hour shifts. One of the most challenging days was the first day of arrival. She is working with two southern Baptist kitchens that are helping the Red Cross produce more than 28,000 meals a day. Those meals are being delivered by Red Cross teams and other partners.

Winamac resident Sherry Fagner is in North Carolina helping coordinate food operations for shelters, emergency response vehicles and flooding victims.
